

New Boy

membering the things we take for granted in America, and Christmas meant sharing as some brought special gifts for Ny to take home and put under his own tree.

Santa Claus was a new idea with great appeal. In spite of his age, Ny wanted very much to believe. When Santa arrived at the Christmas party to pass treats, Ny quietly came to ask where he had "parked" Rudolph and the other reindeer. He seemed to agree that up on the rooftop or in the faculty parking lot would be a good place.

Ny moved nearer for a better look. Even under close scrutiny, Santa was passing inspection until his right eyebrow fell off—plop! Ny emphatically stated, "He not a real Santa Claus, he only a Santa Helper."

There have been other things that have proven confusing as well. Try to imagine a clock that's stopped "running" or two pictures only slightly different, one a pumpkin and the other a jack-o-lantern. Explain why w-i-n-d is sometimes wind and sometimes wind. Experience the frustration of learning that g-i-v-e is give not give in spite of the rule you've learned. Why does a cursive m have only three humps and a manuscript m only two? How many different words for a dog are there? Surely more than one mouse can't be mice, or can they?

Complicated as the English language, American-style, must be, some things are clear. Ny has been a joy and a challenge. North School has an added spark, a positive subject in the teachers' lounge. His discoveries, growth and successes are sources of delight for the various teachers whose lives have been touched by a small refugee boy from Cambodia.

The children see Ny as someone to help them with that word in reading, a child capable of grown-up cursive writing and impressive long division. Yet, Ny has demonstrated he's all boy enough to laugh with glee when a girl shrieks at the grand daddy longlegs he's placed on her arm.

I can only guess at much of the background that Ny brings to our school. Time will show the worth of our influence on Ny, but his effects are apparent now. We've learned there are more likenesses than differences. He's shown us that different isn't bad. One thing is certain. We've all learned the value of a smile. □
